Goodbody Global Smaller Companies Fund

- Industrial strength offset by software selloff
- Moelis a new addition

ESMA SRRRI Risk Rating

Fund Commentary

The Fund finished broadly unchanged for the month against the index up just over 3% in January. The Funds industrial holdings showed strength in the period. AAON (a manufacturer of commercial and industrial HVAC equipment), GTT (an engineering company specialising in containment systems for the transport and storage of LNG), and MSA Safety (a provider of advanced safety equipment for hazardous environments) were the top contributors to performance in the period. However, concerns around AI's potential impact on the software sector led to a sell-off, which offset a lot of the strength from industrials. While we were proactive in reducing our software exposure early in the month, our remaining holdings were still affected by the move. Elsewhere, we initiated new positions during the month, including Moelis & Co, a global independent investment bank in the US. We believe Moelis is well positioned to benefit from a recovery in IPO activity, M&A and financing deals, particularly across the mid-market, in the medium term.

Market Commentary

Global equity markets made a solid start to the year, finishing January up 0.9%. Cyclical sectors extended their momentum from December, with Energy, Materials and Industrials leading performance. Energy and Materials were supported by strong commodity gains for most of the month: silver rose +19%, gold +13%, copper +6% and Brent crude +16%. These advances were partly reversed in the final two trading sessions following the nomination of Kevin Warsh as the next Federal Reserve Chair. Warsh, historically viewed as more conservative on monetary policy, has recently indicated support for interest rate cuts. While the Fed left rates unchanged at its January meeting, markets now expect rate reductions to resume once Warsh formally takes office. Finally, Q4/25 earnings season, which began mid-January, has so far been broadly positive at a headline level with an 11.9% blended y/y earnings growth rate.
